Colonisation – The Salvation of the Maori Race.

Forward.

This book was compiled by Ross Baker, researcher for the One New Zealand Foundation Inc from Jean Jackson's book 2 on New Zealand's history before the Tiriti o Waitangi was signed by over 500 "tangata Maori" chiefs and Governor Hobson on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen on the 6th February 1840.

Before the Treaty was signed, the Northern tribes had gained large numbers of muskets and went on the rampage South killing thousands of their unarmed fellow countrymen, women and children for utu or for the fun of the sport and the feast that followed. It is estimated between 30,000 and 50,000 Maori were killed by these musket wars, but thousands more were driven off their lands, taken as slaves or for food for the warriors. Wellington, Taranaki, Auckland, and most of the South Island were virtually empty of people when the first European settlers arrived in New Zealand. Many chiefs had also traveled to Australia and sold large tracks of their "empty" lands, lands they had taken by force or lands they had lost in battle, to Europeans. Most of this land was returned to the tangata Maori by the Colonial Government. Non-Maori should be allowed to have these sales investigated by the Waitangi Tribunal as there was more land confiscated by the government from non-Maori than that resumed/confiscated from the "rebel" tribes later.

In 1831, 13 Northern chiefs wrote to the King asking him to be their protector and guardian of their lands. By 1838 the country was completely out of control and Britain had to take a more active role in protecting its inhabitants. It was decided with reluctance by the British Government, to send Captain William Hobson to sign a Treaty to allow Britain to gain control over New Zealand and to form a legal government under the jurisdiction of New South Wales to bring peace between the warring tribes. The first time ever for the tangata Maori.

Since this book was written, the ONZF has found and researched a document that has been completely ignored for over 173 years. Queen Victoria's 1840 Royal Charter, our true Founding Document and first Constitution. This document is the most important document in the history and development of New Zealand, and it seems has been deliberately overlooked by our professional historians and governments. How could a document of this nature have been ignored?

Queen Victoria's Royal Charter dated the 16 November 1840, "Enacted the Colony of New Zealand and created and established a Legislative Council, an Executive Council, our Courts and granted certain powers and authority to the Governor for the time being of the said Colony". New Zealand became a British Colony with its own Governor and government under one flag and one law for all the people of New Zealand, irrespective of race, colour or creed.

COLONISATION – THE SALVATION OF THE MAORI RACE (Without Colonisation, where would Maori be today?)

By 1840, Maori had slaughtered over half their fellow countrymen or taken them as slaves and many chiefs had willingly sold or had contracts to sell over two thirds of New Zealand to people from other lands. If it had not been for British Colonisation, it is more than likely the Maori race would be extinct today.

While in England in 1820 completing the first Maori to English dictionary with Samuel Lees, Ngapuhi chief Hongi Hika met Baron Charles de Thierry, a Frenchman and subsequently arranged the purchase of 40,000 acres (16,000 ha) of land at Hokianga, in Northland. The land was bought for 500 muskets plus powder and balls, which de Thierry sent to Sydney, Australia as Hongi had been instructed, he could not purchase muskets in England. Baron De Thierry had an ambition of gaining sovereignty over New Zealand so was this a plan with Hongi Hika to exterminate the majority of the tangata Maori race? As well as uplifting de Thierry's 500 muskets in Sydney, Hika swapped the gifts the King had given him for another 200 muskets. It was this act that ignited the inter-tribal musket wars in New Zealand with the Maori population now declining at an alarming rate with the musket becoming the number one item of trade throughout the country. It is estimated between 1821 and 1830 more than 50,000 Maori, half the population were slaughtered in acts of genocide. By 1831 Maori were beginning to fear they would become extinct, therefore, 13 senior northern chiefs wrote to the King asking him to be their guardian and protector. Where did Hongi Hika get 1000 Muskets in 1821? See page 9. Letter to King William IV from the 13 Chiefs, page 17. James Busby's address in response to the chief's letter, page 14.

But Maori continued to slaughter each other at an alarming rate and by 1838, Ngapuhi had driven Ngatiwhatua from Auckland, Waikato had annihilated Taranaki with one-third slaughtered, one-third taken as slaves and the remainder fleeing south to Wellington and parts of the South Island. Some then 'commandeered' the Rodney and sailed to the Chatham Islands, slaughtering, and farming the peaceful Moriori "like swine" into virtual extinction. Te Rauparaha invaded the South Island, slaughtering hundreds and taking many North as slaves. The tangata Maori race was constantly at war with each other and would have destroyed them-selves if it had not been for British Colonisation in 1840. There were more than 140 major intertribal wars between 1807 and 1845. See page 19.

By the 6th of February 1840, many chiefs had freely sold over two thirds of New Zealand to people from other lands to help buy muskets and finance their intertribal wars. The New Zealand Company was interested in colonising New Zealand and had purchased or had contracts over large areas of land in the Wellington region, with contracts to buy land at Wanganui, Taranaki, and the South Island. The missionaries and others had bought land in Northland including the British Resident James Busby to build his kit-set home. American whalers had 28 whaling stations dotted around the coast as well as land at Russell where James Clendon, the American Consulate had built his house. This later became the first Government House before the seat of Government was moved to Auckland and later to Wellington. The French had also bought large areas of land in the North and South Islands and had announced they were about to annex New Zealand to France. The Maori now feared the French and wanted to put Britain between them and France. By 1840 there were many farms, boat building and general businesses operating within New Zealand by more than 2000 people from other countries. Wellington and Russell had established townships with flourishing communities and businesses but some of these people also took liberties due to the lack of law and order.

Land had been willingly sold or contracts signed for virtually the whole of the South Island by 1840. Many of these contracts being made by lawyers, signed, witnessed, and registered in the New South Wales Supreme Court by chiefs who had travelled to Australia keen to sell their 'empty/unwanted' lands to the highest bidders. Governor Gipps made these sales and contracts known to Captain Hobson when he stopped off in Australia on his way to New Zealand in 1839. After his arrival, Governor Hobson read two Proclamations on 30 January 1840, one stating; that all land purchased from the chiefs before the Treaty was signed, would be fully investigated before legal titles could be issued. See pre-Treaty Land Sales page 24.

By 6 February 1840 virtually two thirds of New Zealand had either been sold or was under signed and witnessed contracts by the chiefs. Most of these contracts are held in the New Zealand or NSW Courts. Areas in black are those areas either sold or under contract prior to 6 February 1840. Some areas in the north of the North Island are hard to see due to the size of this map.

In 1838, 1839 and 1840 Otago and Ngai Tahu chiefs had gone to Sydney hunting for land buyers after the North Island tribes had invaded them and taken most of their lands and tribes North into slavery. In spite of Governor Gipps asking the chiefs to sign a pro-Treaty agreement in Sydney on the 14 February 1840, Otago and Southland's Ngai Tahu chiefs had sold two thirds of the South Island in Australia by 5 February 1840. The North Island invaders sold a third to several other buyers. No South Island chief had signed the Tiriti o Waitangi at this time, so had every right to sell their land before the Treaty was signed under Maori lore.

"Half the South Island was sold by Ngai Tahu chiefs in 1839 to two Australians and a quarter to the New Zealand Company". Pre-Treaty and Pre-emptive Land Buyers of New Zealand by Jean Jackson.

Many South Island chiefs had travelled to Australia to sell their 'empty and unwanted' lands, which had very little, if any value to them now as their tribes had been taken as slaves and they were in fear of being invaded again. These lands were sold by willing sellers and the Deeds were registered in the NSW Supreme Court, therefore what right did Governor Hobson and his newly formed Colonial Government have to overrule the NSW Supreme Court and refuse so many of these legitimate, registered sales? If the Waitangi Tribunal was allowed to investigate these European confiscated lands, the same way as they investigate Maori confiscated lands, there would be very little land for Maori to claim as theirs, as they had sold it before the Treaty was signed.

During the chief's speeches the day before the Treaty was signed on 6 February 1840, some of the chiefs complained that their land had been taken but this was explained by two chiefs, Tamati Pukututu stating, "These chiefs say, 'Don't stay' because they have sold all their possessions and they are filled with foreign property, and they have also no more to sell". Tamati Nene stating, "Is not the land already gone"?

By the time New Zealand was ceded to Britain on the 21st of May 1840, Maori were minor landholders having sold or had contracts over most of their lands to people from other countries. There were more than 1000 sales or contracts made before 15 February 1840. After 21 May 1840, the majority of these sales were either rejected or reduced to 2560 acres (4 square miles) by the Colonial Courts with the rejected land in most cases, being returned to the chiefs that had sold it. This occurred over virtually the whole of the South Island and Taranaki. A few purchasers let their contracts lapse because they could not afford to pay the legal fees. Those that lost their land were not given a refund or compensation by the Government although a few chiefs offered them other lands. Both the South Island and Taranaki have been repurchased up to five times by private buyers or Governments over the years. See letter from the two Taranaki chiefs written in 1860, page 15.

If Britain had not become involved in New Zealand in 1840, then the chiefs that sold their land would have honoured these contracts as their tribes had been taken as slaves and the land was now 'empty or unwanted' land. The chiefs sold many of these areas as they still had 'blood money' hanging over them and the settlers would protect their purchases and therefore, created 'buffer zones' between the warring tribes.

Few of the sales and contracts were disputed by the chiefs that sold them, although it would have been easy for Maori do so as most were fully armed by 1840 and outnumbering the settlers by about 25:1. This land was sold under Maori terms at prices Maori were happy to accept. Most was 'empty/unwanted' land or conquered land at the time and of no real value to Maori. In 1840 there were only about 50,000 Maori in New Zealand (only a few in the South Island and Taranaki, as most had fled, been slaughtered, or taken as slaves) and over 66 million acres of land, so there was plenty of 'empty/unwanted' land at this time. While early missionaries taught Christianity, peaceful ideas, agriculture, or trades to Maori, they also tried to teach the tribal chiefs' humanity, hoping more would free their slaves. Just after the Treaty was signed the returning slaves caused populations to rise in Taranaki and the South Island. The Government had to grant more of the land it had purchased to accommodate the returning slaves to their homelands, which their chiefs had sold. The slaves were despised by surviving chiefs, they were thought of as useless because they had allowed themselves to be taken into slavery and some were castrated, so were no longer accepted by the tribe as equals. This caused friction between those that had returned 'home as freemen' and 'the slaves' in Taranaki, Canterbury and many other places

Occupation of New Zealand by Maori.

Maori never "owned" land, they only "occupied" it for as long as they could defend it. Maori had "acquired" New Zealand from the tangata whenua through conquest and then constantly fought over it and its resources for more than 400 hundred years before British intervention. The Tiriti o Waitangi makes no mention of tangata whenua, it recognised the people that signed it as tangata maori. While there is no forensic evidence to who the tangata whenua were, or when or where they came from, they were a people already inhabiting New Zealand when the tangata maori arrived in the 14th century. Tangata Maori arrived in an inhabited country, just as the British some 400 years later. Government does not have a definition of the indigenous people of New Zealand.

New Zealand Book of Events 1986, page 18. “The traditions are quite clear, wherever crews disembarked there were already tangata whenua (prior inhabitants). The canoe people of the 14th century merged with these tangata whenua tribes. From this time on, the traditions abound with accounts of tribal wars over land and its resources”. Dr Ranganui Walker, Professor, and past Head of Maori Studies at the Auckland University. This was endorsed by Ngapuhi chief David Rankin when he stated in Elocal Magazine, “That Maori are not indigenous to Aotearoa New Zealand”.

One of the greatest salvations of the Maori race was the law that gave the protection of land and life from warring tribes, the first time ever for Maori. Maori could now keep their land or sell it as they wished under the protection of the law. While many chiefs willingly sold most of their land, their ancestors regret it today and blame the Colonial Government. Some land was confiscated by the Colonial Government from tribes that transgressed the law, but most of this land was returned or compensation paid in “full and final” settlements in the 1930’s and 40’s. Many have been and are being re-negotiated again through the apartheid Waitangi Tribunal or in direct negotiations with the Crown.

“Some have said these confiscations were wrong and that they contravened the Treaty of Waitangi, but the chiefs placed in the hands of the Queen of England, the Sovereignty and authority to make laws. Some sections of the Maori people violated that authority, war arose, and blood was spilled. The law came into operation and land was taken in payment. This in itself is Maori custom – revenge – plunder to avenge a wrong. It was their chiefs who ceded that right to the Queen. The confiscations cannot therefore be objected to in the light of the Treaty”. Sir Apirana Ngata, M.A., LI.B.D. M.P., Minister of Native Affairs, 1922.

While Maori today have the Waitangi Tribunal to make claims for lands allegedly confiscated by the Colonial Government, non-Maori have no such Tribunal, yet documents show more land was confiscated from non-Maori by the Colonial Government than ever confiscated from Maori. The land sales were agreed to and honoured by the “Noble Chiefs” that had sold their land on their terms. Some chiefs were angered at the Court for denying their contracts to proceed as they had sold their land on their terms as willing seller/willing buyer.

A warning from Sir Apirana Ngata, MA, LI.B, Lit.D, 1922

“Let me issue a word of warning to those who are in the habit of bandying the name of the Treaty around to be very careful lest it be made the means of incurring certain liabilities under the law which we do not know now, and which are being borne only by the Pakeha”. Could this be Queen Victoria’s 1840 Royal Charter/Letters Patent?

Declaration of Independence.

While James Busby the British Resident had tried to get the chiefs to claim Sovereignty over New Zealand 1835 with his “unauthorised Declaration of Independence”, the ever-present intertribal fighting took precedence over political co-operation as always, and it was abandoned without one meeting taking place. There was neither a Maori Nation, Head of State or even a tribal union in New Zealand in 1840. After the failure of the Declaration of Independence, the Tangata maori in 1840 were just hundreds of small individual tribes constantly at war with each other to defend their individual territories. They were a people fighting a losing battle for survival.

In 1877 Chief Justice, Sir James Prendergast ruled, “So far indeed as that instrument (The Treaty of Waitangi) purported to cede the sovereignty it must be regarded as a ‘simple nullity’. No political body existed capable of making cession of sovereignty.”

With the Southern tribes now arming themselves for utu/revenge against the Northern tribes for the slaughter of their relations and the French about to annex New Zealand to France, 13 Northern chiefs wrote to King William IV in 1831 asking Britain to be their guardian and protector, not only from the French but also from themselves, stating they were a people without possessions/taonga. As only a legal government could bring the protection, law, and order to the entire country the chiefs had asked for in 1831, Britain had to gain sovereignty over the whole country and for this to happen, Governor Hobson needed the majority of the North Island chiefs to sign a Treaty to give up their governments to the Queen. Governor Hobson was not interested in gathering signatures from the South Island as there were very few Maori living there as most had been slaughtered, taken north as slaves. Hobson had also been told by Governor Gipps the Otago and Ngai Tahu chiefs were in Australia selling their ‘empty/unwanted’ lands, therefore Governor Hobson claimed New Zealand under the dependency of New South Wales over the North Island by ‘Treaty’ and over the South Island by ‘Discovery’ on 21 May 1840. Jean Jackson stating, “The NSW Supreme Court has more than 1000 registered contracts for sale and purchase of land in New Zealand, up until 15 February 1840. It is interesting to read the names on these Pre-Treaty Sales showing many of the early settlers that had traded with Maori for many years. They had both built up respect for each other in many transactions including land sales etc. See Pre-Treaty Land Sales page24.

As people from other countries were now the major landholders in New Zealand, the Second Law of the Tiriti o Waitangi had to guarantee “to all the people of New Zealand” (Maori and non-Maori) the possession of their lands, their settlements and all their property, the same that was guaranteed to the “chiefs and hapu”. The Third Law of the Tiriti gave the chiefs and hapu the same rights as the people of England to their lands, their settlements and all their property under one flag and one law.

Before 1840 New Zealand was only under “the shadowy jurisdiction of New South Wales”, therefore Maori still had full control of their affairs in New Zealand. The Waikato claiming Taranaki, Taranaki claiming parts of Wellington and the Chatham Islands and Te Rauparaha claiming large areas of the South Island. The chiefs had every right to offer and sell their lands before Britain gained sovereignty over New Zealand. All this land was sold as “willing seller/willing buyer” by their Maori chiefs.

From the documented evidence, there is no denying, tangata maori were minor landholders in New Zealand at the time the chiefs gave up their territories to Queen Victoria and if the Colonial Government had not dishonoured most of these contracts, Maori would never have regained the land their chiefs had willingly sold.

“If you think these things are wrong, then blame your ancestors who gave away their rights [land] when they were strong”. Sir Apirana Ngata, Minister of Native Affairs, M.A., Ll.B, Lit.D, 1922.

If British Colonisation had not stopped the inter-tribal fighting, slavery, cannibalism, and genocide amongst the Maori and returned the lands they had sold, Maori would more than likely be extinct today. British Colonisation advanced Maori 1000 years without lifting a finger! FACT!

While there are very few books written on the pre-Treaty sales and contracts and how the lands were returned to the chiefs at the buyer's expense after Britain had gained sovereignty, few have been made public. After the Treaty was signed on 6 February 1840, land was then repurchased by the Colonial Government many times over with compensation being paid by the taxpayers for land the chiefs had offered and willingly sold before Britain became legally involve in New Zealand. “Chiefs sold land rights over 60-70% of this country by 1840, though most was given back at buyer's expense. Many owners abandoned their purchased lands due to Crown limits OR the Land Court's judgments, whilst around the country, other buyers who could not pay the court fees had to ‘walk off’ their farms and other estates”. Pre-Treaty Land Sales, by Jean Jackson.

Where did Hongi Hika get 1000 Muskets in 1821?

On the 2 March 1820, Hongi Hika, young chief Waikato, and missionary Thomas Kendall left New Zealand in the whaler New Zealand to visit England and complete the first Maori dictionary. Hongi was also interested in gaining muskets and Kendall was known to be involved in the musket trade in New Zealand. On their arrival in England, they met up with a Frenchman Baron Charles de Thierry. After discussions with Hongi and Waikato, de Thierry showed great interest in becoming a large landholder in New Zealand. De Thierry subsequently arranged the purchase of 40,000 acres (16,000 ha) at Hokianga, in Northland with Hongi Hika. The land was bought for 500 muskets plus powder and balls, which de Thierry sent to Sydney, Australia for Hongi Hika to up lifted on his return to New Zealand.

Hongi Hika also visited King George IV, calling himself the “King of New Zealand”. The King gave him many gifts including a suit of armor, which saved Hongi's life on many occasions when back in New Zealand.

On his return to New Zealand in the Speke, Hongi called into Sydney, Australia to pick up the 500 muskets de Thierry had given him for his 40,000 acres of land. While in Sydney he also swapped the gifts the King had given him, except for the armour for another 300 muskets, powder and balls.

From the evidence below, there is no doubt Hongi Hika collected 500 muskets while he was away in England, but how involved was the Frenchman Baron Charles de Thierry in exterminating the Maori race so he could claim sovereignty over New Zealand, later with the backing of the French Government and an army of Tahitian trained body guards.

The party reached the Bay of Islands on 11 July 1821 and, shortly afterwards, Hongi began to prepare for his campaign. On 5 September 2,000 Ngapuhi armed with 1,000 muskets, laid siege to Mauinaina pa at Tamaki. It was taken with great slaughter – Te Hinaki and 2,000 of his men, as well as many women and children, being killed. The victorious force remained on the battlefield eating the vanquished until they were driven off by the smell of decaying bodies. Hongi then went on the rampage slaughtering or enslaving an estimated 30,000 of his fellow countrymen in an act of genocide.

It is a known fact; Baron Charles de Theirry had an ambition of gaining sovereignty over New Zealand with the help of France and Tahitian trained bodyguards and perhaps Hongi Hika. One of the reasons James Busby had tried to entice the chiefs to sign his failed Declaration of Independence in 1835.

The Evidence

“A Savage Country” by Dr Paul Moon page 65 and 66

But it was Hongi, more than any other chief, who epitomised both the Maori demand for muskets and the use to which they subsequently be put. For all the grandeur he had witnessed in England, Hongi's summary of the nation was that it was a 'country of great muskets and great ships' (although, in the same breath, he acknowledged his hosts' considerable reluctance to furnish him with the weapons he desired). So, with the knowledge that the British were unlikely to supply him with the quantity of muskets he needed, and sensing growing missionary displeasure (officially, at least) with the practice of providing chiefs with weapons, Hongi had taken it upon himself to acquire arms and ammunition for a fresh series of campaigns he was planning on his return and which he was no doubt beginning to rehearse in his mind. Precisely where Hongi acquired his haul of muskets has been subject to debate. Not surprisingly, the sensitivity of selling weapons to a chief known for his wars of aggression was such that there was little benefit in keeping a well-documented record of such transactions. Most sources cite Sydney as the place. According to the popular story, when Hongi arrived in Sydney on his way back to New Zealand, he and Kendall managed to sell the various presents and goods they had received in England and, with the money, purchased cattle and weapons. The repetition of this account has ensured that it has gained a level of credence, which it may not entirely deserve, but the flaws in the story remain, no matter how many times they have been whitewashed. The first difficulty with this conventional version is a circumstantial one: why would Hongi miss the opportunity to buy muskets in England, where they were plentifully available, and wait to make his purchase in Sydney where the supply was by no means certain? One explanation is that later (invariably English) nineteenth-century chroniclers of Hongi's subsequent wars thought that English culpability could be one step removed by the claim that the transaction occurred in Sydney. From a practical point of view, there is also the problem that the gifts Hongi and Kendall received in England were unlikely to have been anywhere near valuable enough to purchase the estimated 500 weapons Hongi ended up bringing with him to New Zealand. Indeed, these returning travellers did not even have the financial means to upgrade their voyage to passenger status (the Church Missionary Society had to dip into its slender reserves to pay for this) on their return home. According to one historian, the muskets Hongi sought were waiting for him in Sydney on the return leg of his voyage. The transaction had apparently been arranged in England by Baron Charles de Thierry, whom Hongi had met in Cambridge, and who had arranged the deal in return for 'extensive territories and rights of chieftainship in New Zealand'. The fact that the bill for the muskets and powder went unpaid by de Thierry (and led to him serving time in a debtors' jail) did not prevent Hongi from uplifting the consignment as he was returning to the Bay of Islands.

Hongi Hika: Warrior Chief, by Dorothy Ulrich Cloher

Cloher has an ingenious speculation on the origin of Hika's muskets that has not often appeared in print: the "hogsheads" of "hardware" ordered for Kendall, Hika and the junior chief, Waikato, by Baron Charles de Thierry after he encountered the trio in Cambridge in 1820, which they found waiting for them in Port Jackson (Sydney Harbour) on their way home. Together with various sums of money and other gifts, de Thierry paid them these goods to purchase "all the land in New Zealand" on which to set up his own sovereign kingdom. Folly of this magnitude begged the chiefs to make use of him.

Wikipedia (A Savage Country by Dr Paul Moon)

De Thierry was enrolled at Magdalen College, Oxford and claimed to have transferred to a college of the University of Cambridge. There, he met Hongi Hika, the Ngāpuhi chief who was visiting England, and the missionary Thomas Kendall. De Thierry subsequently arranged a purchase of 40,000 acres (16,000 ha) at Hokianga, in Northland, through Kendall while at Cambridge. The land was bought for the price of about 500 muskets plus powder and balls, which de Thierry sent to Sydney, Australia. Hongi Hika uplifted the weapons on his return to Sydney. It was this act that ignited the inter-iwi and inter-hapu Musket Wars in New Zealand, which continued until about 1842.

Wikipedia

Hongi Hika returned to the Bay of Islands in July 1821, after 457 days away, via Sydney Australia where he picked up an estimated 500 muskets that were waiting for him. The muskets had been ordered by Baron Charles de Thierry whom Hongi met at Cambridge, England. De Thierry traded the muskets for land in the Hokianga, although de Thierry's claim to the land was later disputed. Hongi was able to uplift the guns without them being paid for. He also had a large quantity of gunpowder, ball ammunition, swords and daggers. Using these within months of his return he led a force of about 2,000 men to attack a pa (Māori Fort) at Panmure on the Tamaki River, killing 2000 warriors and their women and their children in retribution for a previous defeat. Deaths in this one action during the inter tribal Musket Wars outnumber all deaths in 25 years of the sporadic New Zealand Wars.

Ngapuhi war chief Hongi Hika.

A new biography of Hongi Hika appears in the Dictionary of New Zealand Biography on this site.

On 2 March 1820 Hongi and Waikato left in the whaler New Zealander to visit England, where they spent several months in the care of Kendall and Lee. The two chiefs stayed at Cambridge for a short time and helped Professor Lee, who was then compiling a Maori dictionary for the Church Missionary Society. Hongi was well received everywhere he went. He again showed his interest in the arts and crafts of the country and in British military organisation. George IV received him in audience and presented him with a suit of chain mail and several guns. While in England Hongi went to great pains to secure guns and exchanged many of the presents which were showered upon him for these. He returned to Sydney in the Speke and, while there, secured more arms and powder. He also learned of his son-in-law's death during a war against the Thames tribes. Two of the chiefs responsible, Te Hinaki and Te Horeta, were in Sydney at the time and Hongi spoke openly of his intention to lead a force against them as soon as he returned to New Zealand. The Thames chiefs, at Marsden's suggestion, abandoned their projected visit to England and returned to New Zealand with Hongi. The party reached the Bay of Islands on 11 July 1821 and, shortly afterwards, Hongi began to prepare for his campaign. On 5 September 2,000 Ngapuhi, armed with 1,000 muskets, laid siege to Mauinaina pa at Tamaki. It was taken with great slaughter – Te Hinaki and 2,000 of his men, as well as many women and children, being killed. The victorious force remained on the battlefield eating the vanquished until they were driven off by the smell of decaying bodies. After this Hongi laid siege to the Ngati Maru pa at Te Totara (Thames), but failed to reduce it after a two days' siege. He withdrew after making peace with the defenders, but returned under cover of darkness and took the pa without difficulty. As two of his near relatives were killed in this engagement, Hongi treasured the pretext for the new campaign he was meditating upon – against the Waikatos.

Dictionary of New Zealand Biography.

Hongi visited England in 1820, with Kendall and the young chief Waikato. At Cambridge they assisted Professor Samuel Lee with the compilation of a Maori dictionary; they were made much of in society and introduced to George IV. But Hongi's main aim, in which he was eventually successful, was to acquire muskets. He was also given a suit of armour, which gained him a reputation for invulnerability, and helped to demoralise his foes.

Wikipedia – Thomas Kendall

To defend his work Kendall made an unauthorised return to London in 1820, travelling with Hongi Hika and minor chief Waikato. It is possible that Hongi Hika wished to visit Britain and from his perspective Kendall was accompanying him. Although the Church Missionary Society disapproved of the trip, Hongi Hika and Waikato were a social success. Kendall was ordained a priest on 12 November 1820 by the bishop of Ely (though limited to New Zealand because of his lack of classical languages). The Rangatira and Kendall spent five months in Britain, mostly working with Lee in Cambridge, where Kendall's views about the language were justified (if some of his other theories were not; for example, Kendall believed the Māori were descended from Egyptians). Lee and Kendall's A grammar and vocabulary of the language of New Zealand was published in 1820. While in England, Hongi Hika was introduced to King George as the "King of New Zealand" and told Marsden's ban on trading muskets was not correct. He was shown over the Woolwich arsenal and given a suit of armour by the King along with other gifts. At Cambridge Kendall and Hongi met the exiled French adventurer Charles de Thierry with whom Hongi did a land for muskets deal-purchasing 30,000 acres in the Bay of Islands. The 500 muskets, powder, ball, swords and daggers were uplifted from Port Jackson (Sydney) on their return voyage. In the following years, the guns helped him conquer a significant northern portion of the North Island in the Musket Wars and made him a man of considerable importance.^[1]

Letter from 13 Ngapuhi Chiefs asking King William for protection in 1831

(Enclosure 2 in No.1.)

From William Yate, Esq, to the Colonial Secretary, New South Wales, Waimate, New Zealand. November 16, 1831

Sir,

I have the honour to forward to you, by His Majesties Ship, "Zebra" the enclosed New Zealand document, with its translation, and to request that you will lay it before the Governor for his information. I have further to request that it be transmitted through His Excellency to the Secretary of State, in order to it being laid before His Majesty.

I have, &c,

(Signed) William Yate.

(Enclosure 3 in No.1)

To King William, the gracious Chief of England. King William, we, the chiefs of New Zealand assembled at this place, called the Kerikeri, write to thee, for we hear that thou art the great chief of the other side of the water, since the many ships which come to our land are from thee. We are a people without possessions. We have nothing but timber, flax, pork, and potatoes. We sell these things however to your people; then we see property of the Europeans. It is only thy land, which is liberal towards us. From thee also come the missionaries who teach us to believe on Jehovah God and on Jesus Christ His Son. We have heard that the tribe of Marian [the French] is at hand, coming to take away our land. Therefore, we pray thee to become our friend and the guardian of these islands, lest the teasing of other tribes should come near us, and lest strangers should come and take away our land. And if any of thy people should be troublesome and vicious towards us we pray thee to be angry with them that they may be obedient, lest the anger of the people of this land fall upon them. This letter is from us, the chief's of the natives of New Zealand.

(Signed) William Yate, Secretary to the Church Mission Society, New Zealand.

Busby's address to the hospitable crowd who welcomed him to New Zealand.

MY FRIENDS, you will perceive by the letter which I have been honoured with the commands of the King of Great Britain to deliver to you, that it is His Majesty's most anxious wish that the most friendly feeling should subsist between his subjects and yourselves, and how much he regrets that you should have cause to complain of the conduct of any of his subjects.

To foster and maintain this friendly feeling, to prevent as much as possible the recurrence of those misunderstandings and quarrels which have unfortunately taken place, and to give a greater assurance of safety and just dealing both to his own subjects and the people of New Zealand in their commercial transactions with each other, these are the purposes for which His Majesty has sent me to reside amongst you, and I hope and trust that when any opportunities of doing a service to the people of this country shall arise I shall be able to prove to you how much it is my own desire to be the friend of those amongst whom I am come to reside.

It is the custom of His Majesty the King of Great Britain to send one or more of his servants to reside as his representatives in all those countries in Europe and America with which he is on terms of friendship, and in sending one of his servants to reside amongst the chiefs of New Zealand, they ought to be sensible not only of the advantages which will result to the people of New Zealand by extending their commercial intercourse with the people of England, but of the honour the King of a great and powerful nation like Great Britain has done their country in adopting it into the number of those countries with which he is in friendship and alliance.

I am, however, commanded to inform you that in every country to which His Majesty sends his servants to reside as his representatives, their persons and their families, and all that belongs to them are considered sacred.

Their duty is the cultivation of peace and friendship and goodwill, and not only the King of Great Britain, but the whole civilised world would resent any violence which his representative might suffer in any of the countries to which they are sent to reside in his name.

I have heard that the chiefs and people of New Zealand have proved the faithful friends of those who have come among them to do them good, and I therefore trust myself to their protection and friendship with confidence.

All good Englishmen are desirous that the New Zealanders should be a rich and happy people, and it is my wish when I shall have erected my house that all the chiefs will come and visit me and be my friends.

We will then consult together by what means they can make their country a flourishing country, and their people a rich and wise people like the people of Great Britain. At one time Great Britain differed but little from what New Zealand is now. The people had no large houses nor good clothing nor good food. They painted their bodies and clothed themselves with the skins of wild beasts; every chief went to war with his neighbour, and the people perished in the wars of their chiefs even as the people of New Zealand do now.

But after God sent His Son into the world to teach mankind that all the tribes of the earth are brethren, and that they ought not to hate and destroy, but to love and do good to one another, and when the people of England learned His words of wisdom, they ceased to go to war against each other, and all the tribes became one people.

The peaceful inhabitants of the country began to build large houses because there was no enemy to pull them down. They cultivated their land and had abundance of bread, because no hostile tribe entered into their fields to destroy the fruit of their labours. They increased the numbers of their cattle because no one came to drive them away.

They also became industrious and rich and had all good things they desired. Do you then, O chiefs and tribes of New Zealand, desire to become like the people of England?

Listen first to the Word of God, which He has put into the hearts of His servants the missionaries to come here and teach you. Learn that it is the will of God that you should all love each other as brethren, and when wars shall cease among you then shall your country flourish. Instead of the roots of the fern you shall eat bread, because the land shall be tilled without fear, and its fruits shall be eaten in peace.

When there is an abundance of bread, we shall labour to preserve flax and timber and provisions for the ships, which come to trade, and the ships that come to trade will bring clothing and all other things which you desire. Thus, you become rich, for there are no riches without labour, and men will not labour unless there is peace, that they may enjoy the fruits of their labour.

Letter from the two Taranaki Chiefs (Taranaki sold three times)

In the book, “The History of Taranaki”, published in 1878 by B. Wells, a letter from warrior chief Ihaia Kinkumara, written in conjunction with his friend Tamati Tiraora on 15 July 1860, is addressed to the settlers in New Plymouth. In this letter, the chiefs mention three of Taranaki’s earlier purchases.

“Friends, formerly we, the Maoris, lived alone in New Zealand; we did wrong one to another, we ate one another, we exterminated one another. Some had deserted the land; some were enslaved and the remnants that were spared went to seek other lands.

Now this was the arrangement of this Ngatiawa land. Mohau was the boundary on the north. Ngamotu on the south, beyond was Taranaki and Ngatiruanui. All was quiet, deserted; the land, the sea, the streams, the lakes, the forest, the rocks were deserted; the food, the property, the work was deserted; the dead and sick were deserted; the landmarks were deserted.

Then came the Pakeha hither by sea from other dwellings, they came to this land and the Maori allowed them – they came by chance to this place - they came to a place whose inhabitants had left it. There were few men here - the men were remnant, a handful returned from slavery. And pakeha asked, where are the men of this place? And they answered they have been driven away by war, we few have come back from another land. And the Pakeha said, are you willing to sell us this land, And they replied, we are willing to sell it so that it will not remain barren, presently our enemies will come, indeed is the goodness of the Pakeha, he has not said that the payment ceases at the first time.

My friends the Pakeha, wholly through you, this land and the men of this land have become independent, do not say that I have seen this your goodness today for the first time, I knew it formally, at the coming here of governor Grey, I was urgent that the land may be surrendered and paid for by him, that we may live here together, we the Maori and the Pakeha. And my urgency did not end there but through the days of Governor Grey”

(Signed) Ihaia Kinkumara and Tamati Tiraora,

Judge queries ethics of treaty demands researchers ‘pressured to change findings’

WELLINGTON - Some Treaty of Waitangi claimants have asked researchers to change findings that would be unhelpful to their cases says the chairman of the Waitangi Tribunal.

Justice Durie said also that some tribes had even tried to make the payments of researchers conditional on findings being altered. He said the issue – and several others – had raised questions about the need for a code of ethics for researchers claims lodged under the Treaty.

The comments were in a paper, Ethics and Values, released on the Indigenous People and Law website.

Justice Durie said some groups had required commissioned researchers to remove material unhelpful to the claimant's cases or amend their conclusions. Sometimes this was a condition of the researchers being paid. Some also presented biased claims, omitting evidence against their argument that should be presented. "There are also complaints from researchers of instructions not to consult with certain persons, or only those approved by the claimant groups," said Justice Durie.

While Codes of Ethics had caused problems with indigenous claims overseas, he believed they were a good idea.

Tribunal Director, Morrie Love believed the problem raised had occurred with contracted researchers.

The Tribunal had had problems with some claimant's reports but this was now rare.

It now had a wide historical overview of issues covered by the claims around the country and was able to pick up any of the discrepancies quickly. Claimants could obviously say what they wanted. "At the end of the day, a claimant's claim is a claimant's claim".

But claims were heavily scrutinized. Once submitted, the Crown case was also put followed by an independent tribunal report.

A code of ethics was probably a good idea, but ultimately it was up to researchers to fulfill their ethical responsibilities.

Justice Durie said other issues which, could be covered by a code were:

- A view by some claimants that kaumatua opinions and recollections should not be challenged or cross-examined.
- Whether all evidence presented to the tribunal should be publicly available.

"The Tribunal is able to restrict the publication and availability of material, but blanket restrictions give the appearance of secrecy and undermine public confidence in the process".

Final statements as a result of the claim process so far (1999) total more than $530 million.

NZPA

Maori now have assets totaling $37 billion (2013) mainly thanks to the Waitangi Tribunal.

Report of the Land Claims Commissioner, Mr F Dillion Bell, 8 th July 1862.

Most of this information has not been readily available but now Jean Jackson has written 24 books on Pre-Treaty and Pre-emptive Land Sales in New Zealand. They are based on evidence obtained from Archives both in New Zealand and Australia and can be obtained through the One New Zealand Foundation Inc for $50-00 incl. P & P.

I would like to thank members of the One New Zealand Foundation Inc that have help me compile this information, Jean Jackson for her lifetime of research that has made this booklet possible and the One New Zealand Foundation Inc for funding the copying of all the Deeds and many other documents so they can be filed and will not be destroyed in the future as many documents have been in the past and will continue to be destroyed to hide the truth.

Please read this booklet and then do you own research; you will be amazed at what you find. New Zealand was completely out of control when the 13 Northern Chiefs asked King William to be their guardian and protector in 1831. Although James Busby the British Resident did try to get the Chiefs to form a united Government with 'his' Declaration of Independence in 1835, the ever-present intertribal fighting took precedence over political co-operation, as always, and it was abandoned without one meeting taking place. Britain had to intervene if the Maori race was to survive but the ancestors of those that begged them for "Colonisation – The Salvation of the Maori Race", give little, if any gratitude to Britain and its people today, which the Government encourages by propaganda such as the Treaty 2U Exhibition and Te Papa. The End

Please donate or become a member of the One New Zealand Foundation and help return our country to the people of New Zealand and not a small elite group of part-Maori. Membership forms can be found on page 40.
